

Love "You're beautiful but you're empty"

Since we were little, we've been taught about the importance of appearance in our society.

While growing up, I've realised how senseless it's to prioritize the way you look upon everything. the truth is, there's a whole industry behind our thoughts on beauty. We've all been washed by the stereotypes thanks to what big companies have created. In a subliminal way, they force us to the need of buying their products so that we'll fit in this generalized superficiality they've imposed on us.

If we look at the teenagers' insecurities during this stage, they're more influenced and sensitive to develop fears or rejection. They commonly wonder if they're enough.

Despite the circumstances, we've the need to teach next generations what truly matters.

Every human on this earth is enslaved by the unknowledge and blindness towards the importance of feeding our inside feelings.

We've to reduce the amount of time we spend on looking for the approval of others and start focusing on the increase of time we dedicate to ourselves. In order to broaden our horizons, let's learn not only on us but also about the place we live in.

When you leave, you'll not be remembered by having had precious eyes but also for the things you have done and the way you have treated others.
