

Love

I'm looking for friends. What does that mean?

Our society has changed, our everyday life is quite different from our grandparents', even our own parents' life. Consequently, our people have modified their behavior, therefore we don't wear the same clothes, we don't fall in love in the same way, we don't even talk like people used to do, and that's why we are getting indifferent and drifted apart from other people. Let me explain myself, I don't want to generalize, but it is evident that we care more about other people's appearance than about their behavior.

I'm looking for friends, but not the "friends" our society has established. I'm not looking for someone to go and party with or to hang out every day, neither someone who talks to me every afternoon or drives me to wonderful places every weekend. No, this isn't the kind of friends I want, please don't misunderstand me, it's okay to have this kind of friends, but it's my belief that our generation needs real friends, loyal ones who can listen to your problems and help you to work them out, friends that you might not see every day, but you know that they'll always be there for you. People who you can share your silence with, without feeling uncomfortable, friends that tell you about your mistakes and show you the most valuable things in life: to love and to be loved.

Those are the friends I want; thankfully those are the friends I've got.
